

What Our Diversity
Champions Have to Say

Pete Nanos, Laboratory Director, speaking...

Q: If it isn't difficult to get champions, why don't we have more?

A: "The major initiatives ought to be things that people work on every day as part of their day job, and so I'm expecting the Divisions to come forward on these [diversity] issues and tell me what they are doing in a particular area to get something done. And I think making something part of the day job is more important than relying on an extraordinary champion to save you in times of peril."

June 2004

